

TRANSATLANTIC RELATIONS IN A CHANGING STRATEGIC ENVIRONMENT: CRISES AND CHALLENGES

Pierre Haroche

pierre.haroche@sciencespo.fr

This seminar investigates the evolution of relations between the US and European states, with a focus on the strategic and security-related dimensions of this relationship. It seeks to analyse in particular the driving factors behind recent transatlantic crises and divergences and the implications for the future of international security.

In the first part, the seminar introduces several theoretical approaches to transatlantic relations, based on the main International Relations schools of thought. In the second part, the seminar applies these approaches to current challenges facing the transatlantic partnership, ranging from defence burden sharing to responding to Russia's assertiveness, China's rise and crises in the Middle East and Africa.

The final grade will be based upon:

- Engagement in the class (10%)
- One 5-minute press review (20%)
- One 10-minute presentation (30%), responding to one of the week's questions
- One short essay (800-1000 words max) (40%) on the main issues covered during the course. Questions will be given two weeks in advance.
